Forty Years in Search of Arab-Israeli Peace

William B. Quandt

I. Background to the Conflict

The conflict between Israel and its Arab neighbors is overlain with history and religion, but it is best understood as a product of two 20th-century nationalist movements that sought self-determination and statehood in the same small piece of land. The British, who held the League of Nations' mandate over Palestine, never found a mutually acceptable plan for self-government by Jewish Zionists and Palestinian Arabs during their moment of preeminence (1920–1947). It fell to the newly formed United Nations to recommend partition into two states, one Jewish and one Arab. The Palestinians, backed by their Arab brethren, did not accept the partition, decided to wage war against the new state when the British withdrew, and were badly defeated, but not vanquished, on the battlefield.

Over the years that followed, there were truces, outbreaks of fighting, secret and not-so-secret negotiations, but the next big turning point in the conflict came with the Israeli victory in the so-called Six-Day War of June 1967. This opened the way to a new phase of diplomacy, which is essential to understand as background to the current crisis.

II. The Framework: U.N. Resolution 242

As noted, a crucial moment for the region, and for the United States, came in June 1967 when war broke out between Israel and most of her Arab neighbors. Within a matter of days, Israel had won on the battlefield and was in occupation of Arab territories in Sinai, Gaza, the West Bank, and the Golan Heights.

President Lyndon Johnson, at the time preoccupied with the war in Vietnam, made a crucial judgment that there should be no return to the status quo ante. Instead, the United States would support Israel in holding the newly occupied territories until the Arab states were prepared to recognize Israel and make peace. This stand was broadly endorsed by the international community with the acceptance of U.N. Security Council Resolution 242 in November 1967. (See Appendix A)

The basic trade-off envisaged in this important document is between Israeli withdrawal “from territories occupied in the recent conflict” and “termination of all claims or states of belligerency and respect for and acknowledgement of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of every State in the area and their right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries free from threats or acts of force.” While the resolution stopped short of calling for full Israeli withdrawal from all occupied territory and for full peace treaties, it was understood at the time, and subsequently, as calling for an exchange of “land for peace.”

While Resolution 242 established the basic equation that has guided subsequent Arab-Israeli peacemaking, it left many questions unanswered. For example, it referred only obliquely to the Palestinians, calling for a “just settlement of the refugee problem.” It said nothing about what might happen in the West Bank and Gaza, inhabited by a million or so Palestinians and now under Israeli military occupation. Nor did it address the sensitive issue of the status of Jerusalem, formerly divided between Israel and Jordan and now under full Israeli control and annexed to Israel proper.

III. The Peace Process

If Resolution 242 became the centerpiece of Arab-Israeli peace efforts after 1967, it nonetheless is fair to say that little actual peacemaking occurred until after the next big conflict in the region, the October 1973 War. Frustrated by their inability to break the stalemate that had endured on both the diplomatic and military fronts since the 1967 War, Egypt and Syria launched a surprise attack on October 6, 1973. Coming at a crucial moment in the Cold War and in the embattled presidency of Richard Nixon, the war provoked not only a regional crisis but also a global one. This persuaded Nixon and his energetic Secretary of State, Henry Kissinger, to devote unprecedented diplomatic efforts to finding a solution to the conflict.

Kissinger introduced several techniques into what came to be known as the “peace process.” First, he traveled frequently to the area to deal with presidents, prime ministers, and kings on a face-to-face basis. This came to be known as “shuttle diplomacy,” and ever since has been something of a standard by which many judge the seriousness of the American commitment to getting results from diplomacy. Second, Kissinger was skeptical of grand bargains, package deals, and the ability to solve long-standing conflicts quickly. Thus, he urged the parties to focus on practical, small steps toward peace rather than insisting on settling all problems at once. This came to be known as “step-by-step” diplomacy, and three negotiated agreements resulted: Sinai I and Golan I in early 1974, and Sinai II in fall 1975.

IV. Egyptian-Israeli Peace

Kissinger not only helped break the diplomatic logjam between Israel and her Arab neighbors, but also asserted American supremacy over the negotiation process. In his view, only the United States, in part because of the unique relationship that it maintained with Israel and because of its economic and military assets, was in a position to provide the carrots and sticks necessary to move the local parties to make the concessions needed for peace. An early convert to this view was Egyptian President Anwar Sadat, who was fond of declaring that the United States held “99 percent of the cards” in its hands. (He knew this was an exaggeration, but wanted Americans to take seriously the major responsibility that they had assumed as custodians of the peace process.)

By the time Jimmy Carter became president in January 1977, there had been no progress in Arab-Israeli diplomacy for more than a year and tensions were on the rise, especially as the situation in Lebanon deteriorated. Carter and his advisers concluded early on that step-by-step diplomacy had reached an end. It was time, they believed, to see if a comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace could be achieved. This would mean, in Carter’s view, getting the Arab parties to face up to the requirements for peace: the recognition and security that Israel needed. It also entailed the territorial withdrawal and recognition of Palestinian rights that were central demands of the Arabs. Carter was the first American president to talk of a “Palestinian homeland,” a controversial term at the time and one that made clear that the Palestinian issue had to be seen as a political, not simply a humanitarian, issue. Unfortunately for Carter, there was no consensus on who should speak for the Palestinians in future negotiations. Jordan, the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), and even Egypt were all considered at various times.

While any American leader in 1977 would have been obliged to deal with the Arab-Israeli crisis on some level, Carter surprised even his closest aides by devoting an extraordinary amount of time to this one issue. His motives, no doubt, were complex. On the one hand, his religious convictions seem to have played a role. He had been raised on the Bible and stories of the Holy Land. The idea of helping to bring peace to "The Children of Abraham" was deeply appealing to him.

Carter also saw the complexity of the issues as a challenge, not a reason to turn away from the conflict. He had been told as a southerner that racism was simply a fact of life that could not be changed, and he had rebelled against that view. Similarly, when experienced politicians told him that the Arab-Israeli conflict was toxic and insoluble, it simply enhanced his desire to prove them wrong. But one should not dismiss the role of hardheaded strategic calculus in Carter's decision to throw himself into Arab-Israeli peacemaking. He was acutely aware that only a few years earlier the conflict had exploded, with dramatic consequences for the United States. The price of oil had skyrocketed; the U.S. and Soviet Union had nearly confronted each other; Anwar Sadat had come close to losing his gamble. Kissinger had defused the crisis with his step-by-step diplomacy, but there was no reason to think things could remain quiet without further diplomatic efforts by the United States. Certainly this was the view being argued by his closest security advisers. So, for Carter, some very personal motives meshed with some very obvious national security interests. The result was an unprecedented degree of direct presidential involvement.

Carter's ambitious vision of a comprehensive peace was dealt a harsh blow in mid-1977 with the election of Menachem Begin as Prime Minister of Israel. Begin headed the Likud Party, whose central tenet was that Israel had a right to keep all of what he called "Judea and Samaria," or the West Bank. This ran directly counter to the views of those who had crafted U.N. Resolution 242, as did Begin's insistence on Israel's right to build civilian settlements in these territories. Carter and his team were frustrated by Begin's intransigence, but they pushed forward, soon discovering an opening on the Egyptian-Israeli front.

Sadat was worried about the loss of momentum in the peace process and decided to try to break what he saw as a “psychological barrier” to peace by traveling to Israel in November 1977 and calling for “no more war.” The effect in Israel was electrifying, and it soon became clear that the best chance for peace now lay between Egypt and Israel. Sadat and Carter still hoped that something could be included for the Palestinians, but Begin was very reluctant to accept such “linkage.”

In mid-1978, Carter began to despair of ever seeing Begin and Sadat make peace. Therefore, he resorted to high-stakes diplomacy and invited them to a summit meeting at Camp David in September 1978. The setting was secluded, the pressures were intense, and the atmosphere was far from friendly and accommodating. But over a period of thirteen days, with very direct involvement of the president, two documents, The Camp David Accords, were drafted and agreed upon—one a general framework for peace and the other an outline of a specific treaty between Egypt and Israel. (See Appendix B)

Carter’s method for persuading Begin and Sadat to compromise was distinctive. With Begin, he was inclined to persuade through lengthy argumentation. In addition, he enlisted the help of one of Begin’s trusted aides, Attorney General Aharon Barak. It was often Barak, a relatively moderate voice among the Israelis, who would come up with a formula that Begin could accept. At no point did Carter threaten Begin with a suspension of economic or military assistance, although Begin must have been aware that if he were widely seen as responsible for the failure of the talks, there could be some erosion of support for Israel.

With Sadat, Carter had a very different and friendlier relationship. In his memoirs, Carter speaks of Sadat in almost reverential terms. He genuinely felt that Sadat was a man of peace. It also helped that Sadat was not much of a stickler for details, most of which he left to his assistants. Yet he was firm on certain principles. At one point during the Camp David negotiations he announced that he was leaving because he was convinced that Israel was not prepared to return the Sinai to Egypt. Carter went to see him and told him bluntly that he could not leave without endangering both their personal relationship and the overall relationship between the two countries.

It has sometimes been alleged that Carter pressured or bribed one or the other of the principals with offers of (or threats to withdraw) aid. This is fundamentally wrong. With the Israelis, there were neither explicit nor implicit threats. But there was an offer of $3 billion in credits to help pay for the relocation of airbases from the Sinai. With Egypt, there was an expressed willingness to consider substantial military and economic assistance after the conclusion of peace between Israel and Egypt, but this was not codified or given any specific content until much later. Sadat had every reason to expect an improved relationship with the United States if he made peace with Israel—that was his primary goal, after all—but he had remarkably little in the way of concrete commitments from the President.

The reaction to the Camp David Accords in much of the Arab world was surprise and opposition. Many noted a detailed plan for Egyptian-Israeli peace based on the “land for peace” formula of U.N. Resolution 242, but nothing comparable addressing the Palestinian question or the Syrian front. In the view of many Arabs, Sadat had agreed to a “separate peace,” a cardinal sin in terms of Arab nationalist norms. As it soon became clear that Begin had not agreed to halt settlement activity in the West Bank and Gaza, whatever benefit of the doubt might have been given to the aspects of Camp David that were designed to appeal to Palestinians began to fade away.

As the euphoria that followed Camp David began to fade, some of Carter’s advisers feared that he was spending too much time on a losing proposition. They thought he should turn his attention to domestic affairs in anticipation of the re-election campaign that would be fought in 1980. But when Carter decided on one more roll of the dice, his trip to the Middle East to wrap up the treaty negotiations in the spring, it was precisely his domestic adviser, Hamilton Jordan, who urged him on. In his view, if Carter let peace slip away, he would be blamed as a weak and ineffectual leader. His only hope was to invest a bit more energy and get the best deal that he could. In fact, there was little opposition within the Carter inner circle to this view, but later the logic of turning to other issues did reassert itself, and that resulted in Carter’s decision to turn the Palestinian part of the Camp David Accords over to the politically savvy Robert Strauss.

The Egyptian-Israeli peace, however, was achieved, and Carter was its prime architect. Sadat, who had made the peace possible with his dramatic overture to Israel in November 1977, had gone too far to turn back. In March 1979, the first Arab-Israeli peace treaty was signed on the north lawn of the White House. (See Appendix C)

V. Bringing in the Palestinians

Carter was aware that peace between Egypt and Israel did not mean the end of the Arab-Israeli conflict. But he and most Americans nonetheless saw it as a major step in the right direction, one that established a model of sorts for future peace efforts, and one that would make possible a dramatically new relationship between Cairo and Washington.

If he had been re-elected, Carter almost certainly would have resumed the peace process, probably focusing on the Palestinian issue. He had come to the conclusion that this was important in its own right, and that it also had broad strategic implications in a region that was being convulsed by competing nationalist and religious visions. The revolution in Iran had raised concern about a wave of radical Islamist movements challenging the prevailing order and trying to use the Palestine issue to win legitimacy in the eyes of Arabs and Muslims. But it was left to Presidents Ronald Reagan, George H. W. Bush, Bill Clinton, and George W. Bush to find a way to resolve this most difficult part of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

During much of the 1980s and into the early 1990s, the central question for diplomats trying to move forward on Arab-Israeli peace was “who can speak for the Palestinian people?” For most Arabs, the answer was simple: the Palestine Liberation Organization, or PLO. The PLO did not accept U.N. Resolution 242, however, and had not agreed to give up what it called “armed struggle” and the Israelis and Americans called “terrorism.”

In addition, the Palestinian question involved much more than finding an acceptable representative for the Palestinian people. The substantive issues that would have to be resolved eventually included territory (would the West Bank and Gaza be the core of a future Palestinian home, or perhaps even a state?); Jerusalem (would some or all of east Jerusalem come under Palestinian control?); and refugee claims (could Palestinians expect to return to their original homes in Israel proper, or at least receive compensation for those lost properties?). Israelis and Palestinians were sharply divided amongst themselves and between the two sides, and it was a rare American politician who dared to express an opinion on these sensitive issues.

One way out of the impasse seemed to be to bring King Hussein of Jordan in as spokesman for the Palestinians (the Jordan option), either on his own or as head of a joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation. This might help get around the PLO's refusal to accept Res. 242 and Israel's unwillingness to deal with the PLO. President Reagan spelled out the logic of this approach in September 1982. The Reagan Plan urged Israel to stop its settlements and to return most of the West Bank and Gaza to Jordanian control, while stating explicitly that the United States did not favor an independent Palestinian state, preferring some form of association between the Palestinian Territories and Jordan. (See Appendix D)

Prime Minister Begin did not like the plan and it never progressed, but the Jordan option remained a point of reference for U.S. diplomacy until almost the end the Reagan presidency.

In late December 1987, a surprising change took place in the Palestinian Territories, which had been under Israeli control since 1967. A whole generation had now come of age in the West Bank and Gaza and it was tired of living under occupation. In contrast to the older generation of Palestinians living there, they were willing to demand an end to the occupation and to do so forcefully. This was the beginning of what came to be known as the first Intifada, from the Arabic words “shaking off.”

Seven months after the Intifada began, King Hussein of Jordan made a historic speech in which he declared that Jordan no longer had any claim to the West Bank. Henceforth, anyone wanting to deal with the Palestine issue should talk to the PLO. After a few rounds of back-channel diplomacy, that is exactly what the Reagan administration agreed to do in its waning days. But first, it insisted that the PLO accept Resolution 242, recognize Israel’s right to exist, and renounce terrorism. In December 1988 in Geneva, Arafat met all of those conditions and the United States agreed to start talking to the PLO. Another barrier to peacemaking had fallen, although it took time before the Israelis would follow suit.

VI. Going for Broke, Coming Up Short

Early in the presidency of Bill Clinton, a breakthrough in the peace process occurred that had little to do with American diplomacy. On the margins of a negotiation process that had been launched by George H. W. Bush and his Secretary of State, James Baker, in Madrid, Spain, in October 1991, Israel had been meeting with non-PLO Palestinians in Washington, as well as with Jordanians, Lebanese, and Syrians. The framework for a comprehensive peace was being discussed. Yet the Israelis found that little headway could be made in the official channels, so they opened a second track with the help of the Norwegian government. There Israelis met with PLO negotiators and reached agreement on what came to be known as the Oslo Accords, signed at the White House on September 13, 1993. Letters of mutual recognition also were exchanged. (See Appendix E)

During the whole of the Clinton presidency, two tracks of peace-making were pursued, sometimes in parallel and sometimes in competition. One was an effort to push forward the Oslo process, as it came to be called, through incremental steps that would lead eventually to Israeli-Palestinian peace. Needless to say, this was a difficult, frustrating process, marked by fits and starts as one side or the other pulled back from making the hard decisions needed for compromise.

The other track was between Syria and Israel. In many ways it was more straightforward. The Israelis wanted security and recognition; the Syrians wanted their territory back. An eventual agreement almost certainly would have to resemble the Egyptian-Israeli peace plan and be based on the "land for peace" formula of Resolution 242. At various moments during the 1990s, Israel and Syria came very close to reaching agreement on these terms, but by the end of the Clinton presidency, there was still enough of a gap to keep the two sides from reaching agreement.

The Palestinian-Israeli issues came to a head in mid-2000. Clinton decided to go for broke in the waning days of his presidency. He summoned Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak and PLO leader Yasser Arafat to a summit meeting at Camp David (Camp David II). But unlike the first Camp David summit in 1978, this one ended in failure, and the American side placed most of the blame on Arafat. Nonetheless, negotiations continued and Clinton made one last effort on December 23, 2000, for the first time putting forward specific proposals to bridge the gap between the two sides. (See Appendix F)

Both sides expressed reservations, but once again the American side concluded that it was Arafat who stood in the way of an agreement.

VII. The Bush Administration and the Two-State Solution

President George W. Bush came to office just as the Israeli-Palestinian negotiating process was collapsing. A new and tough Israeli Prime Minister, Ariel Sharon, made it known that he would not deal with Arafat. Before long, that became the stance of the United States as well. In the West Bank and Gaza, the situation deteriorated rapidly as the so-called Second Intifada gained momentum. Violence escalated. Israel took back control of parts of the West Bank and Arafat was soon isolated in Ramallah. Peace seemed a distant dream.

President Bush, meanwhile, had to deal with the aftermath of the September 11, 2001 attacks on the United States. The wars in Afghanistan and Iraq became major preoccupations at the expense of Arab-Israeli peace diplomacy. Still, as early as mid-2002, Bush placed new cards on the table. First, he called for new Palestinian leadership, making it clear that he had no intention of dealing with Arafat. At the same time, he spoke openly of a new Palestinian state living side-by-side in peace with Israel. The details remained to be worked out, but the goal now was explicit.

Arafat died in November 2004, and by January 2005, a new Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, was elected. By this time, Sharon had decided that negotiations could take a back seat to unilateral Israeli moves and he had committed to withdrawing his troops and settlers from Gaza by fall 2005, while speeding the construction of a barrier between the West Bank and Israel. Many thought the barrier eventually would mark the line that Israel might be prepared to accept as a future border.

January 2006 saw two dramatic developments. Sharon suffered a massive stroke from which he did not recover. He was succeeded by Ehud Olmert, a less experienced politician who took time to find his footing. On the Palestinian side, elections were held for the Legislative Council in January 2006 and the Hamas Islamist movement won a surprising victory. This meant that the new democratically elected prime minister would be from a party that still contested Israel's right to exist, while the president was from the Fatah mainstream and was committed to negotiations.

This awkward situation prevailed well into 2007, when the two major factions within Palestinian society engaged in a sharp conflict that left Hamas in control of Gaza and the PLO dominant in the West Bank. The unity government experiment was ended and a new Fatah/Independent government was established by Abbas, with somewhat doubtful legitimacy.

It was in these politically fraught circumstances that Israel and the Palestinians resumed talks to see if common principles for peace could be found. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice organized a meeting of Israelis, Palestinians, and some other Arab country representatives in late November 2007 in Annapolis, Maryland, to restore momentum to the peace process.

Not for the first time, there was a real sense on the American side that much was at stake, that time was short, and that moderate and constructive leadership was needed. As important, Americans now seemed to recognize that Israeli-Palestinian peace would help advance American interests in the broader Middle East, where the United States is more deeply involved than ever. Progress has been glacial, however, and it was widely assumed that little would be achieved in coming months.

VIII. Where To From Here?

Whether one is an optimist or a pessimist, hopeful or despairing, the questions must still be asked. How can one best assess the chances for Arab-Israeli peace in the near future? What do we have as evidence? What relevant historical lessons can we access?

Since we cannot know with any degree of confidence what has really been going on in the recent rounds of Israeli-Palestinian talks, it makes sense to start with a glance back at previous efforts to reach peace agreements. By doing so, we may be able to identify conditions in which agreements have actually been reached and implemented.

If we look at the period from the 1973 Arab-Israeli War until today, we can see that there have been a large number of direct and indirect negotiations between the various Arab parties and Israel. Some were substantive, some primarily procedural, some successful and some not. But there has been a lot of activity.

This shows pretty clearly that the best chance of success has been when there is strong leadership on both the Israeli and Arab sides and when the United States has played a strong substantive mediating role. The models on the U.S. side in this regard are Henry Kissinger, Jimmy Carter, and James Baker. We might also conclude from these cases that the Clinton period was a real lost opportunity. Never have there been so many agreements that were not fully implemented. In 1994–95, Rabin, Asad, and Arafat were all fairly strong politically, but Clinton was hesitant and an opportunity was lost. Again in 1999, Asad and Barak were both fairly strong, but Clinton was unwilling to push hard at Shepherdstown for an agreement. By 2000, when Clinton finally decided to get more deeply engaged on the Israeli-Palestinian front, Barak and Arafat were both losing political support and Clinton himself was running out of time. Thus negotiations were unsuccessful.

What about today? The Israeli and Palestinian leaders are both politically weak within their own domestic settings. On the other hand, they are on speaking terms with each other and there even seems to be a degree of mutual respect. But weak leaders do not make good peacemakers. On the U.S. side, we have an administration that started out in 2001 very skeptical about the “peace process” and a president who thought that Clinton’s efforts had been counterproductive. On the whole, this means that the U.S. held back from active involvement in mediation. Occasional pronouncements were made, but—particularly during the Sharon era—the Bush administration held back and let the Israeli leader set the pace. One might have expected things to change after the death of Yasser Arafat in November 2004, but by early 2006, there were two new realities to deal with: the election of a Hamas-led government in Palestine and Olmert’s succession as Prime Minister after Sharon’s stroke.

The combination of relatively weak leaders and weak American involvement suggests that the most that might result from the current peace talks will be an agreement on some general principles. On the Palestinian side, vague principles will do little to help President Mahmoud Abbas and could even weaken him. Unless he can point to some fairly substantial gains for the Palestinians, this is not going to strengthen his awkward position. In addition, the fact that on the U.S. side this will be Condoleezza Rice’s moment in the sun, not Bush’s, does raise some serious questions about how much the U.S. is really prepared to do to get results in the short time remaining on Bush’s watch.

Let’s look a bit more closely at the situation. Olmert has a fairly narrow base of support and is in an awkward coalition with his rival, Ehud Barak. Yet public opinion in Israel will probably support him if he were to adopt “moderate” positions for a “Two-State Solution.” There is a fatigue factor at work on both sides—Israeli and Palestinian—that just might dampen some of the ideological passions that colored previous rounds of talks. In any event, if Olmert moves to the center, he has a chance to gain support, especially at a time when the Abbas-Fayyad government is seen by many Israelis as the best partner they have had to deal with since the days of Sadat and King Hussein. This suggests that Olmert could go at least as far as Barak did in late 2000, more or less accepting the Clinton parameters, without getting into too much trouble. But is he really ready to recognize Palestinian sovereignty over most of the Old City of Jerusalem? He has never hinted at anything like that. Would he and his coalition make any token concessions on the Palestinian “right of return”? To date, it seems that the answer is no. Where he might be flexible is in the realm of land swaps that would mean that a future Palestinian state would have a territory equal in size to all of the West Bank and Gaza.

Abbas is in an even more tenuous position than Olmert. He has some support, especially in the West Bank and internationally, but not much among Palestinians abroad and in Gaza. While Palestinians might stand to gain some control over territory and removal of some of the irritants of everyday life (the checkpoints), they will not get anything close to their minimum demand of the right of return, and maybe not even as much as Arafat was offered on Jerusalem. Could Mahmoud Abbas sell a deal perceived as grossly unfair to the Palestinians today? Could he withstand the likely criticism from both Hamas and some from within the Fatah mainstream? At a minimum he would have to be able to point to early statehood, a good territorial deal, a very generous scheme for compensating refugees for their losses, and some degree of Israeli recognition of its responsibility for the tragedy that has afflicted the Palestinians. This may not sound like much to some Palestinians, but even this will be hard for him to get from the Olmert (or any other) Israeli government.

All of this, of course, is supposed to be agreed upon by the end of 2008, according to President Bush. It is, no doubt, a good thing that the two sides are talking, but my reading of the tea leaves is that they have not really made a lot of progress. If, however, they do manage to reach agreement on some general principles (and I am not entirely pessimistic about their ability to do at least that), the next and more difficult challenge will be to translate the principles into a detailed agreement and then to implement it. There is simply no precedent in Arab-Israeli relations for weak parties being able to take such big and complex steps. Olmert would have to remove at least 100,000 settlers from the West Bank and would have to relinquish control over sensitive parts of Jerusalem. Abbas would have to explain to Palestinians that the "right of return" was to the state, not to their homes. Although most Palestinians may know this on some level, they still believe it is deeply unjust, and Abbas will have a hard time explaining such a fundamental abandonment of a key Palestinian demand. Consequently, apart from the possibility of another "memorandum of understanding," I do not have high hopes for a negotiated agreement in the near term.

As far as I can tell, modest expectations are also the conventional wisdom in official Washington. The prevailing view is that we should encourage small steps, not a "go-for-broke" effort to solve the conflict once and for all. We have heard this all before—the need to allow confidence to build up between the parties, the need for the situation to "ripen," and the (unspoken) need to keep the Arab-Israeli conflict as much outside the realm of upcoming election-year politics as possible. All this is music to Olmert's ears, but hard for Abbas to swallow.

The fact that Hamas is now excluded from the Palestinian government (at least in the West Bank) has given rise to a degree of optimism in some quarters in Washington and in Israel. But driving Hamas into a corner is almost certainly going to make it more, not less, difficult to get a Palestinian consensus on the terms of a peace with Israel. I would be more hopeful if there were a Fatah-Hamas-Independent unity government back in place, but that, of course, was anathema to both Israel and the U.S. The Hamas-Israeli ceasefire, concluded in mid-2008, might be a step in the right direction if it can hold.

What about the Syrian front? Israel and Syria have been engaged in cautious indirect talks since early 2008, with Turkish mediation. It is worth noting that this was done over the objections of the United States, which would prefer to isolate, and possibly replace, the regime in Damascus.

There is a certain logic to the Israeli-Syrian track. Getting Syria into the game, as Baker did in Madrid in 1991, would put pressure on Hamas (Khalid Meshal is in Damascus). It would drive a wedge between Syria and Iran, to some extent, and would give Hizbollah reason to show restraint. In addition, quite a few prominent Israelis, including the foreign minister, have shown interest in negotiations with Syria (the issues are pretty clear cut; the strategic gains could be substantial). We know that President Assad has said repeatedly and in public that he is ready for peace talks, but he has also made clear that the return of Syrian territory would be the price. He wants the United States involved for a variety of reasons: side payments, reassurance, getting off the terrorist list, backing off the Hariri investigation, no more talk of regime change from Washington, etc.

I am inclined to think that many Israelis would like to try the Syrian gambit. If they are really worried about Iran and Hizbollah and Hamas, peace with Syria might have some real dividends. Thus far, however, the two parties seem to be going through the motions rather than seriously negotiating. Although the Bush administration continues to be standoffish, it is no longer adamantly opposed.

In fall 2007, I asked a senior U.S. official directly if it was U.S. policy to block Israeli-Syrian talks even if Israel wanted them. The answer was yes. The reason was that as long as the U.S. policy was aimed at changing the regime in Damascus, or at least its policies, those changes had to precede negotiations. Negotiations would be a reward for a new democratic regime, or a radically transformed Assad regime (think Libya), but not a down payment. In the words of this official, "Diplomacy only makes sense when you have the power realities lined up in your favor first, and that is not yet the case with Syria."

With that as a guideline, previous administrations would never have talked to the Syrians, or to the PLO for that matter. This is a fundamental problem. The Bush administration still thinks of diplomacy as a favor that we do for our "moderate" friends, not as a part of the normal toolkit of being a world power. Until we have a president who is able to explain to the American public what the national interest is in a comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace, and has the courage to use the full range of diplomatic influence to advance a peace agenda, we are likely to see more go-slow gestures that are designed not to raise expectations too high lest the U.S. be seen as tackling "controversial" issues that the parties to the conflict are not ready to confront.

IX. Final Thoughts

There is an emerging school of thought that claims that a negotiated solution to the Arab-Israeli conflict is no longer possible and perhaps no longer very important to the United States. Some talk optimistically of an alternative, a single state in which Israelis and Palestinians will coexist as equals. That seems to me to be a very far off prospect, however appealing it might be.

The real choice, I believe, is between a negotiated "Two-State," "land for peace" type of agreement versus the continuation of the type of conflict we have witnessed in the past ten or more years. While the precise dimensions of a Two-State Solution would be difficult to work out, the general outline is pretty obvious. We have the Clinton proposals and the subsequent Geneva Accords, negotiated by non-official Israelis and Palestinians in order to demonstrate the possibility of finding compromise solutions to the major problems of territory, settlements, Jerusalem, security, and refugee claims.

I continue to feel that the United States, for reasons of its own self-interest, should actively promote a comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace. Even George W. Bush, late in the day, seems to have come to the conclusion that this would serve American national interests, although he has been reluctant to get very deeply involved or to spell out why this is important.

The next president, Barack Obama, will have an opportunity to spell out for the American public and for those in the Middle East a strategy that links our interests in peace, in regional stability, in nonproliferation, and in energy security. This would be an ambitious program and would focus heavily on diplomacy. A crucial piece of the puzzle would be a serious effort to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict. Obviously, this would have to be complemented by a sensible policy in Iraq, a diplomatic engagement with Iran and Syria, and a vision of a “Marshall Plan” for a Middle East at peace. All of this is ambitious, to say the least, but also very much worth doing, and likely to be much more widely supported internationally than the largely unilateral effort we made in Iraq. At the end of the day, it holds much more promise of promoting American values—including democratization and the marginalization of those who preach and use political violence—than does the more overtly muscular policy of the Bush administration. Both at home and in the Middle East, it is time for a change. ●

The Camp David Accords: The Framework for Peace in the Middle East

Muhammad Anwar al-Sadat, President of the Arab Republic of Egypt, and Menachem Begin, Prime Minister of Israel, met with Jimmy Carter, President of the United States of America, at Camp David from September 5 to September 17, 1978, and have agreed on the following framework for peace in the Middle East. They invite other parties to the Arab-Israel conflict to adhere to it.

Preamble

The search for peace in the Middle East must be guided by the following:

* The agreed basis for a peaceful settlement of the conflict between Israel and its neighbors is United Nations Security Council Resolution 242, in all its parts.

* After four wars during 30 years, despite intensive human efforts, the Middle East, which is the cradle of civilization and the birthplace of three great religions, does not enjoy the blessings of peace. The people of the Middle East yearn for peace so that the vast human and natural resources of the region can be turned to the pursuits of peace and so that this area can become a model for coexistence and cooperation among nations.

* The historic initiative of President Sadat in visiting Jerusalem and the reception accorded to him by the parliament, government and people of Israel, and the reciprocal visit of Prime Minister Begin to Ismailia, the peace proposals made by both leaders, as well as the warm reception of these missions by the peoples of both countries, have created an unprecedented opportunity for peace which must not be lost if this generation and future generations are to be spared the tragedies of war.

* The provisions of the Charter of the United Nations and the other accepted norms of international law and legitimacy now provide accepted standards for the conduct of relations among all states.

* To achieve a relationship of peace, in the spirit of Article 2 of the United Nations Charter, future negotiations between Israel and any neighbor prepared to negotiate peace and security with it are necessary for the purpose of carrying out all the provisions and principles of Resolutions 242 and 338.

* Peace requires respect for the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of every state in the area and their right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries free from threats or acts of force. Progress toward that goal can accelerate movement toward a new era of reconciliation in the Middle East marked by cooperation in promoting economic development, in maintaining stability and in assuring security.

* Security is enhanced by a relationship of peace and by cooperation between nations which enjoy normal relations. In addition, under the terms of peace treaties, the parties can, on the basis of reciprocity, agree to special security arrangements such as demilitarized zones, limited armaments areas, early warning stations, the presence of international forces, liaison, agreed measures for monitoring and other arrangements that they agree are useful.

Framework

Taking these factors into account, the parties are determined to reach a just, comprehensive, and durable settlement of the Middle East conflict through the conclusion of peace treaties based on Security Council resolutions 242 and 338 in all their parts. Their purpose is to achieve peace and good neighborly relations. They recognize that for peace to endure, it must involve all those who have been most deeply affected by the conflict. They therefore agree that this framework, as appropriate, is intended by them to constitute a basis for peace not only between Egypt and Israel, but also between Israel and each of its other neighbors which is prepared to negotiate peace with Israel on this basis. With that objective in mind, they have agreed to proceed as follows:

* West Bank and Gaza

Egypt, Israel, Jordan and the representatives of the Palestinian people should participate in negotiations on the resolution of the Palestinian problem in all its aspects. To achieve that objective, negotiations relating to the West Bank and Gaza should proceed in three stages:

1. Egypt and Israel agree that, in order to ensure a peaceful and orderly transfer of authority, and taking into account the security concerns of all the parties, there should be transitional arrangements for the West Bank and Gaza for a period not exceeding five years. In order to provide full autonomy to the inhabitants, under these arrangements the Israeli military government and its civilian administration will be withdrawn as soon as a self-governing authority has been freely elected by the inhabitants of these areas to replace the existing military government. To negotiate the details of a transitional arrangement, Jordan will be invited to join the negotiations on the basis of this framework. These new arrangements should give due consideration both to the principle of self-government by the inhabitants of these territories and to the legitimate security concerns of the parties involved.

2. Egypt, Israel, and Jordan will agree on the modalities for establishing elected self-governing authority in the West Bank and Gaza. The delegations of Egypt and Jordan may include Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza or other Palestinians as mutually agreed. The parties will negotiate an agreement which will define the powers and responsibilities of the self-governing authority to be exercised in the West Bank and Gaza. A withdrawal of Israeli armed forces will take place and there will be a redeployment of the remaining Israeli forces into specified security locations. The agreement will also include arrangements for assuring internal and external security and public order. A strong local police force will be established, which may include Jordanian citizens. In addition, Israeli and Jordanian forces will participate in joint patrols and in the manning of control posts to assure the security of the borders.

3. When the self-governing authority (administrative council) in the West Bank and Gaza is established and inaugurated, the transitional period of five years will begin. As soon as possible, but not later than the third year after the beginning of the transitional period, negotiations will take place to determine the final status of the West Bank and Gaza and its relationship with its neighbors and to conclude a peace treaty between Israel and Jordan by the end of the transitional period. These negotiations will be conducted among Egypt, Israel, Jordan and the elected representatives of the inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza. Two separate but related committees will be convened, one committee, consisting of representatives of the four parties which will negotiate and agree on the final status of the West Bank and Gaza, and its relationship with its neighbors, and the second committee, consisting of representatives of Israel and representatives of Jordan to be joined by the elected representatives of the inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza, to negotiate the peace treaty between Israel and Jordan, taking into account the agreement reached in the final status of the West Bank and Gaza. The negotiations shall be based on all the provisions and principles of UN Security Council Resolution 242. The negotiations will resolve, among other matters, the location of the boundaries and the nature of the security arrangements. The solution from the negotiations must also recognize the legitimate right of the Palestinian peoples and their just requirements. In this way, the Palestinians will participate in the determination of their own future through:

1. The negotiations among Egypt, Israel, Jordan and the representatives of the inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza to agree on the final status of the West Bank and Gaza and other outstanding issues by the end of the transitional period.

2. Submitting their agreements to a vote by the elected representatives of the inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza.

3. Providing for the elected representatives of the inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza to decide how they shall govern themselves consistent with the provisions of their agreement.

4. Participating as stated above in the work of the committee negotiating the peace treaty between Israel and Jordan.

5. All necessary measures will be taken and provisions made to assure the security of Israel and its neighbors during the transitional period and beyond. To assist in providing such security, a strong local police force will be constituted by the self-governing authority. It will be composed of inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza. The police will maintain liaison on internal security matters with the designated Israeli, Jordanian, and Egyptian officers.

6. During the transitional period, representatives of Egypt, Israel, Jordan, and the self-governing authority will constitute a continuing committee to decide by agreement on the modalities of admission of persons displaced from the West Bank and Gaza in 1967, together with necessary measures to prevent disruption and disorder. Other matters of common concern may also be dealt with by this committee.

7. Egypt and Israel will work with each other and with other interested parties to establish agreed procedures for a prompt, just and permanent implementation of the resolution of the refugee problem.

* Egypt-Israel

1. Egypt-Israel undertake not to resort to the threat or the use of force to settle disputes. Any disputes shall be settled by peaceful means in accordance with the provisions of Article 33 of the U.N. Charter.

2. In order to achieve peace between them, the parties agree to negotiate in good faith with a goal of concluding within three months from the signing of the Framework a peace treaty between them while inviting the other parties to the conflict to proceed simultaneously to negotiate and conclude similar peace treaties with a view the achieving a comprehensive peace in the area. The Framework for the Conclusion of a Peace Treaty between Egypt and Israel will govern the peace negotiations between them. The parties will agree on the modalities and the timetable for the implementation of their obligations under the treaty.

* Associated Principles

1. Egypt and Israel state that the principles and provisions described below should apply to peace treaties between Israel and each of its neighbors—Egypt, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon.

2. Signatories shall establish among themselves relationships normal to states at peace with one another. To this end, they should undertake to abide by all the provisions of the U.N. Charter. Steps to be taken in this respect include:

1. full recognition;
2. abolishing economic boycotts;

3. guaranteeing that under their jurisdiction the citizens of the other parties shall enjoy the protection of the due process of law.

3. Signatories should explore possibilities for economic development in the context of final peace treaties, with the objective of contributing to the atmosphere of peace, cooperation and friendship which is their common goal.

4. Claims commissions may be established for the mutual settlement of all financial claims.

5. The United States shall be invited to participate in the talks on matters related to the modalities of the implementation of the agreements and working out the timetable for the carrying out of the obligations of the parties.

6. The United Nations Security Council shall be requested to endorse the peace treaties and ensure that their provisions shall not be violated. The permanent members of the Security Council shall be requested to underwrite the peace treaties and ensure respect of the provisions. They shall be requested to conform their policies and actions with the undertaking contained in this Framework.

Appendix to Annex I

Organization of Movements in the Sinai

Article I

Principles of Withdrawal

1. The withdrawal of Israeli armed forces and civilians from the Sinai will be accomplished in two phases as described in Article I of Annex I. The description and timing of the withdrawal are included in this Appendix. The Joint Commission will develop and present to the Chief Coordinator of the United Nations forces in the Middle East the details of these phases not later than one month before the initiation of each phase of withdrawal.

2. Both parties agree on the following principles for the sequences of military movements.

1. Notwithstanding the provisions of Article IX, paragraph 2, of this Treaty, until Israeli armed forces complete withdrawal from the current J and M Lines established by the Egyptian-Israeli Agreement of September 1975, hereinafter referred to as the 1975 Agreement, up to the interim withdrawal line, all military arrangements existing under that Agreement will remain in effect, except those military arrangements otherwise provided for in this Appendix.

2. As Israeli armed forces withdraw, United Nations forces will immediately enter the evacuated areas to establish interim and temporary buffer zones as shown on Maps 2 and 3, respectively, for the purpose of maintaining a separation of forces. United Nations forces' deployment will precede the movement of any other personnel into these areas.

3. Within a period of seven days after Israeli armed forces have evacuated any area located in Zone A, units of Egyptian armed forces shall deploy in accordance with the provisions of Article II of this Appendix.

4. Within a period of seven days after Israeli armed forces have evacuated any area located in Zones A or B, Egyptian border units shall deploy in accordance with the provisions of Article II of this Appendix, and will function in accordance with the provisions of Article II of Annex I.

5. Egyptian civil police will enter evacuated areas immediately after the United Nations forces to perform normal police functions.

6. Egyptian naval units shall deploy in the Gulf of Suez in accordance with the provisions of Article II of this Appendix.

7. Except those movements mentioned above, deployments of Egyptian armed forces and the activities covered in Annex I will be offered in the evacuated areas when Israeli armed forces have completed their withdrawal behind the interim withdrawal line.

Article II

Subphases of the Withdrawal to the Interim Withdrawal Line

1. The withdrawal to the interim withdrawal line will be accomplished in subphases as described in this Article and as shown on Map 3. Each subphase will be completed within the indicated number of months from the date of the exchange of instruments of ratification of this Treaty:

1. First subphase: within two months, Israeli armed forces will withdraw from the area of El Arish, including the town of El Arish and its airfield, shown as Area I on Map 3.

2. Second subphase: within three months, Israeli armed forces will withdraw from the area between line M of the 1975 Agreement and line A, shown as Area II on Map 3.

3. Third subphase: within five months, Israeli armed forces will withdraw from the area east and south of Area II, shown as Area III on Map 3.

4. Fourth subphase: within seven months, Israeli armed forces will withdraw from the area of El Tor–Ras El Kenisa, shown as Area IV on Map 3.

5. Fifth subphase: Within nine months, Israeli armed forces will withdraw from the remaining areas west of the interim withdrawal line, including the areas of Santa Katrina and the areas east of the Giddi and Mitla passes, shown as Area V on Map 3, thereby completing Israeli withdrawal behind the interim withdrawal line.

2. Egyptian forces will deploy in the areas evacuated by Israeli armed forces as follows:

1. Up to one-third of the Egyptian armed forces in the Sinai in accordance with the 1975 Agreement will deploy in the portions of Zone A lying within Area I, until the completion of interim withdrawal. Thereafter, Egyptian armed forces as described Article II of Annex I will be deployed in Zone A up to the limits of the interim zone.

2. The Egyptian naval activity in accordance with Article IV of Annex I will commence along the coasts of areas I, III and IV, upon completion of the second, third, and fourth subphases, respectively.

3. Of the Egyptian border units described in Article II of Annex I, upon completion of the first subphase one battalion will be deployed in Area I. A second battalion will be deployed in Area II upon completion of the second subphase. A third battalion will be deployed in Area III upon completion of the third subphase. The second and third battalions mentioned above may also be deployed in any of the subsequently evacuated areas of the southern Sinai.

3. United Nations forces in Buffer Zone I of the 1976 Agreement will redeploy enable the deployment of Egyptian forces described above upon the completion of the subphase, but will otherwise continue to function in accordance with the provisions of that Agreement in the remainder of that zone until the completion of interim withdrawal, as indicated in Article I of this Appendix.

4. Israeli convoys may use the roads south and east of the main road junction east of El Arish to evacuate Israeli forces up to the completion of interim withdrawal. These convoys will proceed in daylight upon four hours notice to the Egyptian liaison group and United Nations forces, will be escorted by United Nations forces, and will be in accordance with schedules coordinated by the Joint Commission. An Egyptian liaison officer will accompany convoys to assure uninterrupted movement. The Joint Commission may approve other arrangements for convoys.

Article III

United Nations Forces

1. The Parties shall request that United Nations forces be deployed as necessary to perform the functions described in the Appendix up to the time of completion of final Israeli withdrawal. For that purpose, the Parties agree to the redeployment of the United Nations Emergency Force.

2. United Nations forces will supervise the implementation of this Appendix and will employ their best efforts to prevent any violation of its terms.

3. When United Nations forces deploy in accordance with the provisions of Article and II of this Appendix, they will perform the functions of verification in limited force zones in accordance with Article VI of Annex I, and will establish check points, reconnaissance patrols, and observation posts in the temporary buffer zones described in Article II above. Other functions of the United Nations forces which concern the interim buffer zone are described in Article V of this Appendix.

Article V

Definition of the Interim Buffer Zone and Its Activities

1. An interim buffer zone, by which the United Nations Force will effect a separation of Egyptian and Israeli elements, will be established west of and adjacent to the interim withdrawal line as shown on Map 2 after implementation of Israeli withdrawal and deployment behind the interim withdrawal line. Egyptian civil police equipped with light weapons will perform normal police functions within this zone.

2. The United Nations Force will operate check points, reconnaissance patrols, and observation posts within the interim buffer zone in order to ensure compliance with the terms of this Article.

3. In accordance with arrangements agreed upon by both Parties and to be coordinated by the Joint Commission, Israeli personnel will operate military technical installations at four specific locations shown on Map 2 and designated as T1 (map central coordinate 57163940), T2 (map central coordinate 59351541), T3 (map central coordinate 5933-1527), and T4 (map central coordinate 61130979) under the following principles:

1. The technical installations shall be manned by technical and administrative personnel equipped with small arms required for their protection (revolvers, rifles, sub-machine guns, light machine guns, hand grenades, and ammunition), as follows:

- * T1—up to 150 personnel
- * T2 and T3—up to 350 personnel
- * T4—up to 200 personnel

2. Israeli personnel will not carry weapons outside the sites, except officers who may carry personal weapons.

3. Only a third party agreed to by Egypt and Israel will enter and conduct inspections within the perimeters of technical installations in the buffer zone. The third party will conduct inspections in a random manner at least once a month. The inspections will verify the nature of the operation of the installations and the weapons and personnel therein. The third party will immediately report to the Parties any divergence from an installation's visual and electronic surveillance or communications role.

4. Supply of the installations, visits for technical and administrative purposes, and replacement of personnel and equipment situated in the sites, may occur uninterruptedly from the United Nations check points to the perimeter of the technical installations, after checking and being escorted by only the United Nations forces.

5. Israel will be permitted to introduce into its technical installations items required for the proper functioning of the installations and personnel.

6. As determined by the Joint Commission, Israel will be permitted to:

1. Maintain in its installations fire-fighting and general maintenance equipment as well as wheeled administrative vehicles and mobile engineering equipment necessary for the maintenance of the sites. All vehicles shall be unarmed.

2. Within the sites and in the buffer zone, maintain roads, water lines, and communications cables which serve the site. At each of the three installation locations (T1, T2 and T3, and T4), this maintenance may be performed with up to two unarmed wheeled vehicles and by up to twelve unarmed personnel with only necessary equipment, including heavy engineering equipment if needed. This maintenance may be performed three times a week, except for special problems, and only after giving the United Nations four hours notice. The teams will be escorted by the United Nations.

7. Movement to and from the technical installations will take place only during daylight hours. Access to, and exit from, the technical installations shall be as follows:

1. T1: Through a United Nations check point, and via the road between Abu Aweigila and the intersection of the Abu Aweigila road and the Gebel Libni road (at Km. 161), as shown on Map 2.

2. T2 and T3: through a United Nations checkpoint and via the road constructed across the buffer zone to Gebel Katrina, as shown on Map 2.

3. T2, T3, and T4: via helicopters flying within a corridor at the times, and according to a flight profile, agreed to by the Joint Commission. The helicopters will be checked by the United Nations Force at landing sites outside the perimeter of the installations.

8. Israel will inform the United Nations Force at least one hour in advance of each intended movement to and from the installations.

9. Israel shall be entitled to evacuate sick and wounded and summon medical experts and medical teams at any time after giving immediate notice to the United Nations Force.

4. The details of the above principles and all other matters in this Article requiring coordination by the Parties will be handled by the Joint Commission.

5. These technical installations will be withdrawn when Israeli forces withdraw from the interim withdrawal line, or at a time agreed by the parties.

Article VI

Disposition of Installations and Military Barriers

Disposition of installations and military barriers will be determined by the Parties in accordance with the following guidelines:

1. Up to three weeks before Israeli withdrawal from any area, the Joint Commission will arrange for Israeli and Egyptian liaison and technical teams to conduct a joint inspection of all appropriate installations to agree upon condition of structures and articles which will be transferred to Egyptian control and to arrange for such transfer. Israel will declare, at that time, its plans for disposition of installations and articles within the installations.

2. Israel undertakes to transfer to Egypt all agreed infrastructures, utilities, and installations intact, inter alia, airfields, roads, pumping stations, and ports. Israel will present to Egypt the information necessary for the maintenance and operation of the facilities. Egyptian technical teams will be permitted to observe and familiarize themselves with the operation of these facilities for a period of up to two weeks prior to transfer.

3. When Israel relinquishes Israeli military water points near El Arish and El Tor, Egyptian technical teams will assume control of those installations and ancillary equipment in accordance with an orderly transfer process arranged beforehand by the Joint Commission. Egypt undertakes to continue to make available at all water supply points the normal quantity of currently available water up to the time Israel withdraws behind the international boundary, unless otherwise agreed in the Joint Commission.

4. Israel will make its best effort to remove or destroy all military barriers, including obstacles and minefields, in the areas and adjacent waters from which it withdraws, according to the following concept:

1. Military barriers will be cleared first from areas near populations, roads and major installations and utilities.

2. For those obstacles and minefields which cannot be removed or destroyed prior to Israeli withdrawal, Israel will provide detailed maps to Egypt and the United Nations through the Joint Commission not later than 15 days before entry of United Nations forces into the affected areas.

3. Egyptian engineers will enter those areas after United Nations forces enter to conduct barrier clearance operations in accordance with Egyptian plans to be submitted prior to implementation.

Flight profiles will cover the Limited Forces Zones to monitor the limitations on forces and armaments, and to determine that Israeli armed forces have withdrawn from the areas described in Article II of Annex I, Article II of this Appendix, and Maps 2 and 3, and that these forces thereafter remain behind their lines. Special inspection flights may be flown at the request of either Party or of the United Nations.

3. Only the main elements in the military organizations of each Party, as described in Annex I and in this Appendix, will be reported.

2. Both Parties request the United States operated Sinai Field Mission to continue its operations in accordance with previous agreements until completion of the Israeli withdrawal from the area east of the Giddi and Mitla Passes. Thereafter, the Mission be terminated.

Appendix D

The Reagan Plan (September 1, 1982)

Today has been a day that should make all of us proud. It marked the end of the successful evacuation of the P.L.O. from Beirut, Lebanon. This peaceful step could never have been taken without the good offices of the United States and, especially, the truly heroic work of a great American diplomat, Philip Habib. Thanks to his efforts I am happy to announce that the U.S. Marine contingent helping to supervise the evacuation has accomplished its mission.

Our young men should be out of Lebanon within two weeks. They, too, have served the cause of peace with distinction and we can all be very proud of them.

But the situation in Lebanon is only part of the overall problem of the conflict in the Middle East. So, over the past two weeks, while events in Beirut dominated the front page, America was engaged in a quiet, behind-the-scenes effort to lay the groundwork for a broader peace in the region.

For once, there were no premature leaks as U.S. diplomatic missions traveled to Mid-East capitals and I met here at home with a wide range of experts to map out an American peace initiative for the long-suffering peoples of the Middle East, Arab and Israeli alike.

It seemed to me that, with the agreement in Lebanon, we had an opportunity for a more far-reaching peace effort in the region—and I was determined to seize that moment. In the words of the scripture, the time had come to “follow after the things which make for peace.”

Tonight, I want to report to you on the steps we have taken, and the prospects they can open up for a just and lasting peace in the Middle East.

America has long been committed to bringing peace to this troubled region. For more than a generation, successive U.S. administrations have endeavoured to develop a fair and workable process that could lead to a true and lasting Arab-Israeli peace. Our involvement in the search for Mid-East peace is not a matter of preference; it is a moral imperative. The strategic importance of the region to the U.S. is well known.

But our policy is motivated by more than strategic interests. We also have an irreversible commitment to the survival and territorial integrity of friendly states. Nor can we ignore the fact that the wellbeing of much of the world's economy is tied to stability in the strife-torn Middle East. Finally, our traditional humanitarian concerns dictate a continuing effort to peacefully resolve conflicts.

When our administration assumed office in January 1981, I decided that the general framework for our Middle East policy should follow the broad guidelines laid down by my predecessors.

There were two basic issues we had to address: First, there was the strategic threat Lebanese to rebuild their war-torn country. We owe it to ourselves and to posterity, to move quickly, to build upon this achievement. A stable and revived Lebanon is essential to all our hopes for peace in the region. The people of Lebanon deserve the best efforts of the international community to turn the nightmares of the past several years into a new dawn of hope.

But the opportunities for peace in the Middle East do not begin and end in Lebanon. As we help Lebanon rebuild, we must also move to resolve the root causes of conflict between the Arabs and Israelis.

This war in Lebanon has demonstrated many things, but two consequences are key to the peace process:

First, the military losses of the P.L.O. have not diminished the yearning of the Palestinian people for a just solution of their claims; and second, while Israel's military success in Lebanon have demonstrated that its armed forces are second to none in the region, they alone cannot bring just and lasting peace to Israel and her neighbours.

The question now is how to reconcile Israel's legitimate security concerns with the legitimate rights of the Palestinians. And that answer can only come at the negotiating table. Each party must recognize that the outcome must be acceptable to all and that true peace will require compromises by all.

So, tonight, I am calling for a fresh start. This is the moment for all those directly concerned to get involved in—or lend their support to—a workable basis for peace. The Camp David agreement remains the foundation of our policy. Its language provides all parties with the leeway they need for successful negotiations.

I call on Israel to make clear that the security for which she yearns can only be achieved through genuine peace, a peace requiring magnanimity, vision and courage.

I call on the Palestinian people to recognize that their own political aspirations are inextricably bound to recognition of Israel's right to a secure future.

And I call on the Arab states to accept the reality of Israel—and the reality that peace and justice are to be gained only through hard, fair, direct negotiations.

In making these calls upon others, I recognize that the United States has a special responsibility. No other nation is in a position to deal with the key parties to the conflict on the basis of trust and reliability.

The time has come for a new realism on the part of all the peoples of the Middle East. The State of Israel is an accomplished fact; it deserves unchallenged legitimacy within the community of nations. But Israel's legitimacy has thus far been recognized by too few countries, and has been denied by every Arab state except Egypt. Israel exists; it has a right to exist in peace behind secure and defensible borders, and it has a right to demand of its neighbours that they recognize those facts.

I have personally followed and supported Israel's heroic struggle for survival, ever since the founding of the State of Israel 34 years ago. In the pre-1967 borders Israel was barely 10 miles wide at its narrowest point. The bulk of Israel's population lived within artillery range of hostile Arab armies. I am not about to ask Israel to live that way again.

The war in Lebanon has demonstrated another reality in the region. The departure of the Palestinians from Beirut dramatizes more than ever the homelessness of the Palestinian people. Palestinians feel strongly that their cause is more than a question of refugees. I agree.

The Camp David agreement recognized that fact when it spoke of "the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people and their just requirements." For peace to endure, it must involve all those who have been most deeply affected by the conflict. Only through broader participation in the peace process—most immediately by Jordan and by the Palestinians—will Israel be able to rest confident in the knowledge that its security and integrity will be respected by its neighbours. Only through the process of negotiation can all the nations of the Middle East achieve a secure peace.

These, then, are our general goals. What are the specific new American positions and why are we taking them?

In the Camp David talks thus far, both Israel and Egypt have felt free to express openly their views as to what the outcome should be. Understandably, their views have differed on many points.

The United States has thus far sought to play the role of mediator; we have avoided public comment on the key issues. We have always recognized—and continue to recognize—that only the voluntary agreement of those parties most directly involved in the conflict can provide an enduring solution. But it has become evident to me that some clearer sense of America's position on the key issues is necessary to encourage wider support for the peace process.

First, as outlined in the Camp David accords, there must be a period of time during which the Palestinian inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza will have full autonomy over their own affairs. Due consideration must be given to the principle of self-government by the inhabitants of the territories and to the legitimate security concerns of the parties involved.

The purpose of the five-year period of transition which would begin after free elections for a self-governing Palestinian authority is to prove to the Palestinians that they can run their own affairs, and that such Palestinian autonomy poses no threat to Israel's security.

The United States will not support the use of any additional land for the purpose of settlements during the transition period. Indeed, the immediate adoption of a settlement freeze by Israel, more than any other action, could create the confidence needed for wider participation in these talks. Further settlement activity is in no way necessary for the security of Israel and only diminishes the confidence of the Arabs and a final outcome can be freely and fairly negotiated.

I want to make the American position clearly understood: the purpose of this transition period is the peaceful and orderly transfer of domestic authority from Israel to the Palestinian inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza. At the same time, such a transfer must not interfere with Israel's security requirements.

Beyond the transition period, as we look to the future of the West Bank and Gaza, it is clear to me that peace cannot be achieved by the formation of an independent Palestinian state in those territories. Nor is it achievable on the basis of Israeli sovereignty or permanent control over the West Bank and Gaza.

So the United States will not support the establishment of an independent Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza, and we will not support annexation or permanent control by Israel.

There is, however, another way to peace. The final status of these lands must, of course, be reached through the give-and-take of negotiations; but it is the firm view of the United States that self-government by the Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza in association with Jordan offers the best chance for a durable, just and lasting peace.

We base our approach squarely on the principle that the Arab-Israeli conflict should be resolved through the negotiations involving an exchange of territory for peace. This exchange is enshrined in United Nations Security Council Resolution 242, which is, in turn, incorporated in all its parts in the Camp David agreements. U.N. Resolution 242 remains wholly valid as the foundation-stone of America's Middle East peace effort.

It is the United States' position that—in return for peace—the withdrawal provision of Resolution 242 applies to all fronts, including the West Bank and Gaza.

When the border is negotiated between Jordan and Israel, our view on the extent to which Israel should be asked to give up territory will be heavily affected by the extent of true peace and normalization and the security arrangements offered in return.

Finally, we remain convinced that Jerusalem must remain undivided, but its final status should be decided through negotiations.

In the course of the negotiations to come, the United States will support positions that seem to us fair and reasonable compromises and likely to promote a sound agreement. We will also put forward our own detailed proposals when we believe they can be helpful. And, make no mistake, the United States will oppose any proposal—from any party and at any point in the negotiating process—that threatens the security of Israel. America's commitment to the security of Israel is ironclad. And I might add, so is mine.

During the past few days, our ambassadors in Israel, Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia have presented to their host countries the proposal in full detail that I have outlined here tonight.

I am convinced that these proposals can bring justice, bring security and bring durability to an Arab-Israeli peace.

The United States will stand by these principles with total dedication. They are fully consistent with Israel's security requirements and the aspirations of the Palestinians. We will work hard to broaden participation at the peace table as envisaged by the Camp David Accords. And I fervently hope that the Palestinians and Jordan, with the support of their Arab colleagues, will accept this opportunity.

Tragic turmoil in the Middle East runs back to the dawn of history. In our modern day, conflict after conflict has taken its brutal toll there. In an age of nuclear challenge and economic interdependence, such conflicts are a threat to all the people of the world, not just the Middle East itself. It is time for us all—in the Middle East and around the world—to call a halt to conflict, hatred and prejudice; it is time for us all to launch a common effort for reconstruction, peace and progress.

It has often been said—and regrettably too often been true—that the story of the search for peace and justice in the Middle East is a tragedy of opportunities missed.

In the aftermath of the settlement in Lebanon we now face an opportunity for a broader peace. This time we must not let it slip from our grasp. We must look beyond the difficulties and obstacles of the present and move with fairness and resolve toward a brighter future. We owe it to ourselves—and to posterity—to do no less. For if we miss this chance to make a fresh start, we may look back on this moment from some later vantage point and realize how much that failure cost us all.

These, then, are the principles upon which American policy toward the Arab-Israeli conflict will be based. I have made a personal commitment to see that they endure and, God willing, that they will come to be seen by all reasonable, compassionate people as fair, achievable and in the interests of all who wish to see peace in the Middle East.

Tonight, on the eve of what can be the dawning of new hope for the people of the troubled Middle East—and for all the world's people who dream of a just and peaceful future—I ask you, my fellow Americans, for your support and your prayers in this great undertaking.

“Oslo Accords”

Israel-Palestine Liberation Organization Agreement: 1993

The Government of the State of Israel and the Palestinian team representing the Palestinian people agree that it is time to put an end to decades of confrontation and conflict, recognize their mutual legitimate and political rights, and strive to live in peaceful coexistence and mutual dignity and security to achieve a just, lasting and comprehensive peace settlement and historic reconciliation through the agreed political process. Accordingly, the two sides agree to the following principles.

Article I AIM OF THE NEGOTIATIONS

The aim of the Israeli Palestinian negotiations within the current Middle East peace process is, among other things, to establish a Palestinian Interim Self-Government Authority, the elected Council, (the "Council") for the Palestinian people in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, for a transitional period not exceeding five years, leading to a permanent settlement based on Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338.

It is understood that the interim arrangements are an integral part of the whole peace process and that the negotiations on the permanent status will lead to implementation of Security Council Resolution 242 and 338.

Article II FRAMEWORK FOR THE INTERIM PERIOD

The agreed framework for the interim period is set in this declaration of principles.

Article III ELECTIONS

1. In order that the Palestinian people in the West Bank and Gaza Strip may govern themselves according to democratic principles, direct, free and general political elections will be held for the Council under agreed supervision and international observation, while Palestinian police will insure public order.
2. An agreement will be concluded on the exact mode and conditions of the elections in accordance with the protocol attached as Annex I, with the goal of holding the elections not later than nine months after the entry into force of this Declaration of Principles.
3. The elections will constitute a significant interim preparatory step toward the realization of the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people and their just requirements.

Article IV JURISDICTION

Jurisdiction of the Council will cover West Bank and Gaza territory, except for issues that will be negotiated in the permanent status negotiations. The two sides view the West Bank and Gaza Strip as a single territorial unit, whose integrity will be preserved during the interim period.

Article V TRANSITIONAL PERIOD AND PERMANENT STATUS NEGOTIATIONS

1. The five-year transitional period will begin upon the withdrawal from the Gaza strip and Jericho area.

2. Permanent status negotiations will commence as soon as possible, but not later than the beginning of the third year of the interim period between the Government of Israel and the Palestinian people representatives.

3. It is understood that these negotiations shall cover remaining issues, including: Jerusalem, refugees, settlements, security arrangements, border, relations and cooperation with their neighbors, and other issues of common interest.

4. The two parties agreed that the outcome of the permanent status negotiations should not be prejudiced or preempted by agreements reached for the interim period.

Article VI PREPARATORY TRANSFER OF POWERS AND RESPONSIBILITIES

1. Upon the entry into force of this Declaration of Principles and withdrawal from the Gaza and Jericho area, a transfer of authority from Israeli military government and its Civil Administration to the authorized Palestinians for this task, as detailed herein, will commence. This transfer of authority will be of preparatory nature until the inauguration of the Council.

2. Immediately after the entry into force of this Declaration of Principles and the withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and the Jericho area, with the view of promoting economic development in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, authority will be transferred to the Palestinians on the following spheres: education and culture, health, social welfare, direct taxation, and tourism, the Palestinian side will commence in building the Palestinian police, as agreed upon. Pending the inauguration of the Council, the two parties may negotiate the transfer of additional powers and responsibilities, as agreed upon.

Article VII INTERIM AGREEMENT

1. The Israeli and Palestinian delegations will negotiate an agreement on the interim period (the "Interim Agreement").

2. The Interim Agreement shall specify, among other things, the structure of the Council, the number of its members, and the transfer of powers and responsibilities from the Israeli military government and its Civil Administration to the Council. The Interim Agreement shall also specify the Council's executive authority, legislative authority in accordance with Article IX below, and the independent Palestinian judicial organs.

3. The Interim Agreement shall include arrangements, to be implemented upon the inauguration of the Council, for the assumption by the Council of all of the powers and responsibilities transferred previously in accordance with Article VI above.

4. In order to enable the Council to promote economic growth, upon its inauguration, the Council will establish, among other things, a Palestinian Electricity Authority, a Gaza Sea Port Authority, a Palestinian Development Bank, a Palestinian Export Promotion Board, a Palestinian Environmental Authority, a Palestinian Land Authority and a Palestinian Water Administration Authority, and any other authorities agreed upon, in accordance with the Interim Agreement that will specify their powers and responsibilities.

5. After the inauguration of the Council, the Civil Administration will be dissolved, and the Israeli military government will be withdrawn.

Article VIII PUBLIC ORDER AND SECURITY

In order to guarantee public order and internal security for the Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, the Council will establish a strong police force, while Israel will continue to carry the responsibility for defending against external threats, as well as the responsibility for overall security of Israelis for the purpose of safeguarding their internal security and public order.

Article IX LAWS AND MILITARY ORDERS

1. The Council will be empowered to legislate, in accordance with the Interim Agreement, within all authorities transferred to it.

2. Both parties will review jointly laws and military orders presently in force in remaining spheres.

Article XI ISRAELI-PALESTINIAN COOPERATION IN ECONOMIC FIELDS

Recognizing the mutual benefit of cooperation in promoting the development of the West Bank, the Gaza Strip and Israel, upon the entry into force of this Declaration of Principles, an Israeli-Palestinian Economic Cooperation Committee will be established in order to develop and implement in a cooperative manner the programs identified in the protocols attached as Annex III and Annex IV.

Article XII LIAISON AND COOPERATION WITH JORDAN AND EGYPT

The two parties will invite the Governments of Jordan and Egypt to participate in establishing further liaison and cooperation arrangements between the Government of Israel and the Palestinian representatives on one hand, and the Governments of Jordan and Egypt, on the other hand, to promote cooperation between them. These arrangements will include the constitution of a Continuing Committee that will decide by agreement on the modalities of admission of persons displaced from the West Bank and Gaza Strip in 1967, together with necessary measures to prevent disruption and disorder. Other matters of common concern will be dealt with by the Committee.

Article XIII REDEPLOYMENT OF ISRAELI FORCES

2. In redeploying its military forces, Israel will be guided by the principle that its military forces should be redeployed outside populated areas.
3. Further redeployments to specified location will be gradually implemented commensurate with the assumption of responsibility for public order and internal security by the Palestinian police force pursuant to Article VIII above.

Article XIV ISRAELI WITHDRAWAL FROM THE GAZA STRIP AND JERICHO AREA

Israel will withdraw from the Gaza Strip and Jericho area, as detailed in the protocol attached as Annex II.

Minutes

President Clinton:

Territory:

Based on what I heard, I believe that the solution should be in the mid-90%s, between 94–96% of the West Bank territory of the Palestinian State.

The land annexed by Israel should be compensated by a land swap of 1–3% in addition to territorial arrangements such as a permanent safe passage.

The Parties also should consider the swap of leased land to meet their respective needs. There are creative ways of doing this that should address Palestinian and Israeli needs and concerns.

The Parties should develop a map consistent with the following criteria:

- * 80% of settlers in blocks.
- * Contiguity.
- * Minimize annexed areas.
- * Minimize the number of Palestinian affected.

Security:

The key lies in an international presence that can only be withdrawn by mutual consent. This presence will also monitor the implementation of the agreement between both sides.

My best judgment is that the Israeli presence would remain in fixed locations in the Jordan Valley under the authority of the International force for another 36 months. This period could be reduced in the event of favorable regional developments that diminish the threats to Israel.

On early warning stations, Israel should maintain three facilities in the West Bank with a Palestinian liaison presence. The stations will be subject to review every 10 years with any changes in the status to be mutually agreed.

Regarding emergency developments, I understand that you will still have to develop a map of the relevant areas and routes. But in defining what is an emergency, I propose the following definition:

Imminent and demonstrable threat to Israel's national security of a military nature that requires the activation of a national state emergency.

Of course, the international forces will need to be notified of any such determination.

On airspace, I suggest that the state of Palestine will have sovereignty over its airspace but that two sides should work out special arrangements for Israeli training and operational needs.

I understand that the Israeli position is that Palestine should be defined as a "demilitarized state" while the Palestinian side proposes "a state with limited arms." As a compromise, I suggest calling it a "non-militarized state."

This will be consistent with the fact that in addition to a strong Palestinian security forces. Palestine will have an international force for border security and deterrent purposes.

Jerusalem and Refugees:

I have a sense that the remaining gaps have more to do with formulations than practical realities.

Jerusalem:

The general principle is that Arab areas are Palestinian and Jewish ones are Israeli. This would apply to the Old City as well. I urge the two sides to work on maps to create maximum contiguity for both sides.

Regarding the Haram/Temple Mount, I believe that the gaps are not related to practical administration but to the symbolic issues of sovereignty and to finding a way to accord respect to the religious beliefs of both sides.

I know you have been discussing a number of formulations, and you can agree one of these. I add to these two additional formulations guaranteeing Palestinian effective control over the Haram while respecting the conviction of the Jewish people.

Regarding either one of these two formulations will be international monitoring to provide mutual confidence.

1—Palestinian sovereignty over the Haram, and Israeli sovereignty over a) the Western Wall and the space sacred to Judaism of which it is a part; b) the Western Wall and the Holy of Holies of which it is a part.

There will be a fine commitment by both not to excavate beneath the Haram or behind the Wall.

2—Palestinian sovereignty over the Haram and Israeli sovereignty over the Western Wall and shared functional sovereignty over the issue of excavation under the Haram and behind the Wall such that mutual consent would be requested before any excavation can take place.

Refugees:

I sense that the differences are more relating to formulations and less to what will happen on a practical level.

I believe that Israel is prepared to acknowledge the moral and material suffering caused to the Palestinian people as a result of the 1948 war and the need to assist the international community in addressing the problem.

An international commission should be established to implement all the aspects that flow from your agreement: compensation, resettlement, rehabilitation, etc.

The US is prepared to lead an international effort to help the refugees.

The fundamental gap is on how to handle the concept of the right of return. I know the history of the issue and how hard it will be for the Palestinian leadership to appear to be abandoning this principle.

The Israeli side could not accept any reference to a right of return that would imply a right to immigrate to Israel in defiance of Israel's sovereign policies and admission or that would threaten the Jewish character of the state.

Any solution must address both needs.

The solution will have to be consistent with the two-state approach that both sides have accepted as a way to end the Palestinian-Israeli conflict: the state of Palestine as the homeland of the Palestinian people and the state of Israel as the homeland of the Jewish people.

Under the two-state solution, the guiding principle should be that the Palestinian state would be the focal point for Palestinians who choose to return to the area without ruling out that Israel will accept some of these refugees.

I believe that we need to adopt a formulation on the right of return that will make clear that there is no specific right of return to Israel itself but that does not negate the aspiration of the Palestinian people to return to the area.

In light of the above, I propose two alternatives:

1—Both sides recognize the right of Palestinian refugees to return to historic Palestine, or,

2—Both sides recognize the right of Palestinian refugees to return to their homeland.

The agreement will define the implementation of this general right in a way that is consistent with the two-state solution. It would list the five possible homes for the refugees:

1—The state of Palestine.

2—Areas in Israel being transferred to Palestine in the land swap.

3—Rehabilitation in host country.

4—Resettlement in third country.

5—Admission to Israel.

In listing these options, the agreement will make clear that the return to the West Bank, Gaza Strip, and areas acquired in the land swap would be the right of all Palestinian refugees, while rehabilitation in host countries, resettlement in third countries and absorption into Israel will depend upon the policies of those countries.

Israel could indicate in the agreement that it intends to establish a policy so that some of the refugees would be absorbed into Israel consistent with Israel's sovereign decision.

I believe that priority should be given to the refugee population in Lebanon.

The parties would agree that this implements resolution 194.

The End of Conflict:

I propose that the agreement clearly mark the end of the conflict and its implementation put an end to all claims. This could be implemented through a UN Security Council Resolution that notes that Resolutions 242 and 338 have been implemented and through the release of Palestinian prisoners.

Concluding remarks:

I believe that this is the outline of a fair and lasting agreement.

It gives the Palestinian people the ability to determine their future on their own land, a sovereign and viable state recognized by the international community, Al-Quds as its capital, sovereignty over the Haram, and new lives for the refugees.

It gives the people of Israel a genuine end to the conflict, real security, the preservation of sacred religious ties, the incorporation of 80% of the settlers into Israel, and the largest Jewish Jerusalem in history recognized by all as its capital.

This is the best that I can do. Brief your leaders and tell me if they are prepared to come for discussions based on these ideas. If so, I would meet them next week separately. If not, I have taken this as far as I can.

These are my ideas. If they are not accepted, they are not just off the table, they also go with me when I leave office.

Note: After reading the above text to the Israeli and Palestinian delegates in the Roosevelt Room of the White House, President Clinton left the room. His aides went over the text subsequently to ensure that each side had copied the points accurately. No written text was presented. This version is derived from that published in Haaretz (English), January 1, 2001, and a slightly more complete version issued by the Jerusalem Media and Communication Center.
