

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The struggle to earn a livelihood is the central burden of all human endeavors. The current iteration of globalization has multiple and profound impacts upon such efforts. We are grateful to our authors for sharing their thoughts on the topic. In addition, we thank College Relations, Media Services, Bon Appétit, and Campus Programs for their assistance. Students were indispensable to the whole task of mounting the International Roundtable, and, here, we must point out Heather Kunin '11 and Cassie Veach '09 for providing sharp eyes in helping to proofread drafts of the essays. Together, the two exemplify the high intelligence and maturing predisposition that are marks of Macalester students. We appreciate their contributions.

The Macalester International Roundtable, an intellectual festival convened each October, is an occasion for serious conversations across the College on topics of transnational significance. The practice is to commission a set of essays—a keynote address, followed by two additional major essays delivered by seasoned scholars—which become the center of dialogue and discussions. Each of the two essays receives a public response from a Macalester senior and a member of the faculty. The purposes of the Roundtable are: to cogitate together upon crucial but difficult global questions and to cultivate further the equipoise that minds of the Macalester academic community have long been expected to hold between local anxieties and transnational pressures.
