Blatter, Ethelbert

1984 Beautiful Flowers of Kashmir. Reprint, 2 v., 402 p., ill., 22 cm.

The beautiful valley of Kashmir, proverbially known 'as the heaven on earth', abounds in mountainous flora which Blatter's book focuses upon. The author offers a meticulous study of a wide variety of flowers of the region, describing, among other things, characteristic features of each individual species, its flowering season, and distribution.

Rendered in a language which reduces the technical jargon to the minimum, the book comprises black and white sketches of every species, ably supported with a glossary and an index of popular and botanical names. There is little doubt that this 'reprint' will have a general appeal to both the specialists and the non-specialists.

Chib, S. S.

1984 Kanauras of the Trans Himalaya. vii, 216 p., maps, plates, 23 cm.

Of the various tribes that inhabit the mystical heights and downs of the Himalayas, the Kanauras shot into the limelight after the Chinese aggression of 1962 and the earthquake of 1975. They, (the Kanauras) are a tribe inhabiting Kinnaur, the partly trans Himalaya region lying adjacent to Western Tibet.

The study, developed from the author's extensive, painstaking fieldwork, delineates the Kanauras, their history, economy, habitat and culture, and also seeks to explore the rich, yet hitherto unknown cultural heritage of the Kinnaur region.

Guenther, Herbert V.

1984 Matrix of Mystery: Scientific and Humanistic Aspects of rDzogs-chen Thought. Illustrated.

Utilizing a key root Buddhist scripture, the Guhyagarbha ("Matrix of Mystery"), along with dozens of commentaries from Tibetan texts, Professor Guenther presents the highest (Ati) teachings of the Nyingma school. In relating these teachings to modern scientific and humanistic perspectives, he demonstrates how, in many cases, the traditional religious and modern secular perspectives interface.

Military History of Nepal.

1983 In two parts. (c. 1824), 32 cm., xxxiv, 998 p., 2 illustrations

Nepal, wedged between two giants — India and China — has always been in a vulnerable position of crucial geopolitical significance. But by and large, for centuries it has remained independent and isolated from outside influences, ruled by several Hindu Kings. However, in the early nineteenth century, the Gorkhas in Nepal rose to power, overthrew several other kings and made incursions into the north-eastern frontiers of British India. The outcome was a two-year campaign by the British against the Gorkhas, with support from some native kings.

A clear picture of this campaign can be obtained from this work. Divided into two parts, it contains all pertinent documents and correspondence relating to the campaign. Before planning their action, the British had to obtain vital information about the terrain of Nepal, hitherto unexplored by them. The surveys and observations of field officers provided data about the roads, bridges, riverways, etc. The officers' reports also contained invaluable information relevant to every aspect; from suggested modifications of the troops' uniform and foot-wear to suit the hilly terrain; to facts about local people (merchants, petty kings, etc.) who would be useful allies. A detailed narrative of the war is also presented. The facts about the organization, equipment and supply of troops, the operation of each troop, and the outcome of each engagement with the enemy are evident from these dispatches.

The work provides a singular account of the typical way in which the British launched their campaigns in South Asia, during the height of their imperialist rule. Their attention towards detail, methodicity and the remarkable abilities of their officers made it possible for them to execute several successful military campaigns like the present one. All in all, the scholars specializing in history, military strategy, and those interested in Nepal will find this a useful work.

Myers, Diana K. with Arthur Alden Leeper and Valrae Reynolds
1985 Temple, Household, Horseback: Rugs of the Tibetan Plateau. 112 pages, 6 color plates, 74 black and white illustrations.

Temple, Household, Horseback: Rugs of the Tibetan Plateau is the catalog of the world's first exhibition of Tibetan rugs, held at the The Textile Museum, Washington, D.C., from November 1, 1984 to March 31, 1985. Of special interest to art historians and collectors are the illustrations of 70 rugs, most of which have never before been published. They reflect the quality and diversity of Tibetan holdings of The Textile Museum; the National Museum of Natural History, Smithsonian Institution; The Museum for Textiles (Toronto); and many private collections.

Vibrant with color and graced with auspicious symbols, Tibetan rugs display a fascinating panorama of dragons and snow lions, peonies and phoenixes, lotuses and pearls of happiness. They are, however, among the least studied of all pile rugs, although their production in south central Tibet attracted Western attention in the late nineteenth century. Numerous British trade emissaries and explorers who traversed the Himalayas at that time noted the ubiquitous household craft in villages and in workshops operating on the estates of the local nobility. Their reports fascinated the Colonial Office and trading station staff as well as members of the Royal Geographical Society. Traditionally produced for a multitude of utilitarian and decorative functions, Tibetan pile weavings remained little-known to the world until the Chinese occupation of 1959 and the establishment of refugee settlements in neighboring Nepal and India. Self-help organizations sought to maintain native skills essential to life on the Tibetan plateau, and to adapt them to commercial use for export.

While the variety of specialized formats seen in Tibetan rugs indicates they and similar textiles have long been an integral part of life on the Tibetan plateau, the origin and development of traditional pile weaving with its distinctive characteristics remain shrouded in mystery. This relatively obscure craft is analyzed in the exhibition catalog, Temple, Household, Horseback: Rugs of the Tibetan Plateau.

The introduction by Valrae Reynolds, curator of Oriental Collections at the Newark Museum, describes Tibet's geography and political history, its development into a unique religious state, and its culture, which is more familiar through its colorful and highly sophisticated sacred arts. Arthur Alden Leeper explores archaeological evidence and other sources for clues to the antiquity of Tibetan rugs and the distinctive cut-loop structure of their pile.

The chapters by Diana K. Myers, guest curator of the Textile Museum exhibition, document the development of the craft since the 18th century and emphasize the post-1870 period of aristocratic patronage. She examines how the Tibetan weavers absorbed, modified, and reinterpreted symbols of other cultures. An essay on materials, weaving techniques, and dyeing introduces new perspectives towards an understanding of the evolution of Tibetan rug making. This comprehensive catalog includes a survey of the secular and religious functions of rugs as a framework for detailed discussion of the designs and structures of individual examples.

Both the catalog and the exhibition were supported by a grant from SCM Corporation.

1984 Flowers of the Himalaya. xxx, 580 p, 128 p. of coloured plates: ill., 23 cm.

Perhaps the first to identify, in their totality, the wild flora of the Himalaya (from Kashmir and Ladakh to Nepal and Sikkim), this voluminous text characterizes about 1500 species vegetating the higher altitudes between 1200 and 5500 m. Profusely illustrated with over 690 colour photographs and 315 line sketches, the book's added attraction is a glossary and a bibliography. The study is based on the Himalayan collections of the British Museum and also on the recently compiled "Enumeration of the Flowering Plants of Nepal" published by the British Museum.

Saklani, Girija

1984 The Uprooted Tibetans in India: A Sociological Study of Continuity and Change. xx, 1152 p., 13 leaves of plates, 3 maps, 22 cm.

A study of the trauma and social change among a people whose social system had for many centuries been the most stubbornly change-resistant and tradition-bound. The work profiles the scale, direction and processes of change in the structural and behavioural patterns and brings out the new Tibetan identity shaping through the acutest stresses and strains, flux and ferment, common to most refugee conditions. Chiefly based on sociological investigations, the findings reveal that the rapidly unfolding scenario of change in the Tibetan social system is no less fascinating than their vaunted past.

The study also probes the refugees' responses to the settlement policy and programmes, the processes of interaction between the Tibetan refugees and the host people and their cultures, and most importantly the ideological changes that the new generation of Tibetans have imbibed and the way they envision their future.

Tibetan Rug News

1984 This booklet contains reprints from the Tibetan Rug Association Newsletters published 1982-83. The essays by Diana K. Myers, Donna K. Strahan and Jane M. Schnell were selected and compiled into a handy five-by-seven booklet of information about Tibetan rugs. In addition to the articles on design, dying, dyestuffs, structure, symbols, and conservation, an index and a glossary were added. All the previous illustrations are supplemented by six new whole rug drawings and block prints.

NEW FILM FROM THE WISCONSIN SOUTH ASIA AREA CENTER

A 30-minute film has been added to the WISAAC Outreach collection of multi-media materials about South Asia. Entitled High in the Himalayas, the film introduces Sir Edmund Hillary and his family as they camp at Mt. McKinley National Park in Alaska, and in the Antarctic. The family of 5 is then shown preparing to climb Mt. Taweche in the Himalayas. Beautiful panorama views of snowy mountains provide a background for these scenes. The second half of this lovely film shows the Hillarys' relationship with the Sherpa communities who live in this mountainous area of Nepal, and shows the tangible help they have been able to provide. A new hospital, school and piped-in running water, manpower and theoretical expertise in building bridges and a huge terrace project are shown. This part of the film focuses on non-mechanized construction practices, using ingenuity and human power to move fresh-cut timbers several miles from the forest to the river's edge, and moving stones to build a wall. The film ends as the Sherpa community thanks the Hillary family during a majestic seasonal harvest festival filled with feasting, dance and music at a Buddhist monastery.

The film is a gift from Sears, Roebuck & Co.'s Film Library. It is suitable for general audiences. The film is available on loan for 30 days from the WISAAC Outreach Office, 1249 Van Hise Hall, University of Wisconsin, Madison, WI 53706.

CONTINUING RESEARCH PAPER SERIES ON NEPAL

The Agricultural Development Council in Nepal, in conjunction with the Agricultural Projects Services Center, publishes a research paper series on agricultural issues in Nepal. The most recent number in the series, Number 25, was published in May 1984.

Production and Price Responsiveness of Crops in Nepal (No. 25)
Som P. Pudasaini

This study examines the production pattern, resource productivity and price responsiveness of rice, wheat, maize, and sugarcane in the terai and hill regions of Nepal.

Crop yields were low in all regions of Nepal from 1967/68 to 1982/83. Rice and maize yields began to decline beginning in the mid-1970s, the largest yield decline occurring in the mountain region, followed by the hills and terai. The wheat yield continued to increase marginally during the whole period in the hills and terai, while it started to drop in the mountain beginning in the mid-1970s. rice and maize production peaked in the mid-1970s and has stagnated or declined since then. While wheat production registered a modest increase in the terai and hill regions throughout the study period, it declined in the mountains. Area expansion was the main source of increased production for all crops.

Fertilizer contributed positively to crop production in both the terai and hill regions but its impact was stronger in the former. Capital investments in traditional tools and area expansion had lower returns than their respective opportunity costs in both regions. The marginal value products of labor in the terai and of the bullocks in the hills exceeded their respective opportunity costs. Education contributed positively to production.

Price responsiveness for marketed crops (sugarcane and wheat) was higher than for subsistence (rice and maize) crops. Output supply and input demand were more elastic to changes in output prices than to input prices. Both output and input price elasticities of all crops were higher in the terai than in the hills.

For information on the research paper series, contact the Agricultural Projects Service Center, P.O. Box 1440, Panchayat Plaza, Kathmandu, Nepal, or The Agricultural Development Council, Inc., 725 Park Avenue-4th floor, New York, New York 10021 USA. The Nepal address of the ADC is P.O.
