

CONTRIBUTORS

Abwaan Sacad Axmed Xasan-roodhiile is a Somali poet.

Danielle Cotter is an Analyst for the Global Center. She focuses on the Global Center's research and programming related to anti-money laundering and countering the financing of terrorism (AML/CFT), particularly in countries in East and West Africa. She has contributed writing and analysis to reports on AML/CFT issues and countering violent extremism and works on capacity-building programs with a focus on developing economies. She holds a BA in international relations with an East Asia focus from Tufts University.

Tracey Durner is a Programs Associate for the Global Center. She provides program assistance to the Global Center's work on such issues as anti-money laundering and countering the financing of terrorism in Ethiopia. Previously, she worked as a fundraising project manager at Massachusetts General Hospital, and she has significant volunteer experience in Uganda and Cameroon. She holds a BA in international affairs and political science from Northeastern University.

Mohamed Aden Hassan is a Research Fellow at the Centre for Urban and Community Research (CUCR), Goldsmiths, University of London. Mohamed's current research focuses on the social, economic and political impact of Mobile Money with the emphasis on safe and secure ways to uphold cash flow and transactions taking the Somali corridor as case study. He is currently also working on a DfID funded research on accountability in all six regions of Somaliland and supervises a team of six research assistants. Mohamed holds a BA in International Marketing Management from Hogeschool Holland, University of Professional Education, Diemen, the Netherlands, a PGCE from Brunel, an MA in Migration and Diaspora Studies from the School of Oriental and African Studies and a PhD in Sociology from Goldsmiths College, University of London.

Thomas J. Jones has worked in educational development in the Horn of Africa for the last 12 years. His interest in the Somali region developed from time spent with the Somali community in his home state of Minnesota. He has taught courses or developed language programs at Amoud University, University of Hargeisa, and the University of Djibouti. Currently, he is working to develop an international school based in English for Djibouti and to promote educational research for the region.

Giulia Liberatore is a Leverhulme Early Career Fellow at the Centre on Migration, Policy and Society (COMPAS), University of Oxford. She has a PhD in Anthropology from the London School of Economics, and her research interests are Islam in Europe, gender, migration, diaspora, multiculturalism, ethics and subjectivity. Research for this article was conducted while working as a Research Officer on the project 'Diaspora engagement in war-torn societies' which is part of the Leverhulme funded Oxford Diasporas Programme (ODP).

Helmi Ben Meriem is a PhD student at The University of Sousse in Tunisia working on Somali author Nuruddin Farah. He is also the Anglophone author of two novels and a collection of short stories, not yet published but currently under review by journals and publishing houses. His interests include Anglophone literature, gender, and sexual politics, and comparative theological studies.

Timothy Wilson is an Associate Economic Affairs Officer at the Economic Commission for Africa. He is a development economist with particular experience in post-disaster economic recovery. His work has covered a number of countries, including Haiti, Kenya, Somalia, Tanzania and New Zealand. Timothy is currently based in Kigali, Rwanda. All views in this article are his own and do not reflect the views of his employer.