The poems in this series were written as walking meditations wide open views, dispassionate discourse relying on concrete images and the recusal of self from recollection and accounting While writing I referred to these poems as sketches but now refer to them as photo-poems direct reflections of city-scapes, like the photos I took, black and white portraits that anyone would see if they looked
HE CAN'T MAKE IT

The bullet-faced man leans into his stride. Rope-straddled, head taut with a boxed refrigerator, skull and spine brace each foot forward. As the refrigerator drags and hurries him past women nestled between centuries-old statues, with handfuls of garlic and ginger or dirtied heads of cauliflower and piled radishes spilling onto the street, a rickshaw porting glass and motorcycles gunning their motors veer into the intersection. The rope ridging his brow pulls back... feet slip, head lunges.

Eyes stinging, lungs knotted with exhaust, he can't make it! past shouts and shattered glass, he can't make it!

past the last step he made.

PURCHASE

Start with the girl in the gutter.
Her mat of plastic spread on the sidewalk just past the shop where porters bend to take boxed refrigerators on their backs. Start with the lockets and locks she’s set out for sale.

If not her, then the boy ringed with satchels standing like a coat-rack in the circle where roads cross. Forget the passersby, no matter how drawn their faces Forget pale-faced mannequins draped with shawls or silk.

Wait till the fifteen-year-old leans into the weight of it. Catch his eyes grimace to take that first step led on by a lean mustached man who fears for his purchase.

Then turn to catch the coconut man unaware; fruit sellers unsuspecting, Hands held close to the chest: RRUUPPPPESSESS clutched and counted. Faded, folded wads tucked in at the waist.

Dead-end where the road does.

Behind a low wall topped with barbed wire, a girl, with child, reaches for payment. Ranged along the wall, dime novels proffer women, leering, lurid, like her fearful for their purchase.

Indrachowk; Kastamandap; Sundara Key Chains and Combs, Rani Pokhari, Kathmandu, Nepal.

IF BODIES HAVE VOICES

Wrapped in rags, flies all about you, matted hair, vein-gnarled hands,
a man’s strength locked in your jaw, squint that narrows to the distant enemy we all are.

Whirlwind voice, screams that claw back into the throat.
If bodies are to be held, yours is falling...
Walls/Pavement/Cardboard
Bundled clothes

Your home is where we spit and squat, where gears shift, motors grind and their scattershot fumes blossom above

Bhotahity
