In the Blood, a 1999 play by Pulitzer Prize and Obie Award winning American playwright Suzan-Lori Parks, is a moving indictment of the cruelties of “public assistance,” focusing on the plight of one homeless woman, Hester, and her five children. A retelling of Nathaniel Hawthorne’s The Scarlet Letter, In the Blood evokes ideas of wilderness, suffering, and pain experienced by Hawthorne’s protagonist and translates them to the urban experience of the present. Hester’s reality is torn between the unconditional, often-comical love for her five “treasures,” and the abuse she suffers at the hand of the civilized world, whether facing threats from child protection services, street-side doctors, or ex-lovers. In the Blood is a provocative piece about the ones who fall through the cracks, into the gutter, and are constantly seeking a leg up but are never seen.

This is the first time Macalester is producing one of Parks’ plays, and Waters said he’s “excited to present her work in effort to direct our attention to the very current problem of homelessness and the self-perpetuating structure it creates.”

The performance features award-winning guest and Twin Cities artists Trevor Bowen and T. Mychael Rambo as well as Ivey award-winning actor Mike Croswell.

“It was important to incorporate the community as much as possible into the production of this piece because homelessness is a very real problem in the Cities, and community members can bring another perspective to the performance and to the issue,” said Waters. Keeping in this vein, each show will feature a lobby exhibit from an artist of the Kulture Klub Collaborative.
